The Australian Football League (AFL) is huge.

The medal which is awarded to the fairest and best AFL player is the Brownlow Medal and it is a big deal.

One man is so far ahead in the Brownlow polling that he would have to be shot to not win the medal. Well ... he is shot and still goes on to win the medal posthumously.

Our story revolves around this horror. That and the search for the perpetrators of this outrage. In fact, the manhunt takes on a life of its own.

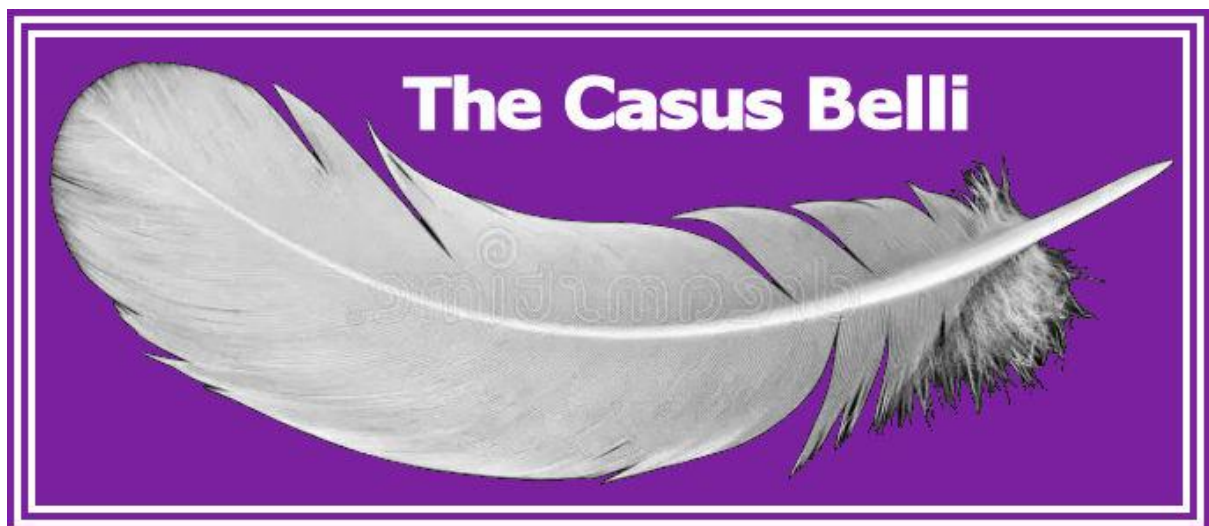

While the AFL world is reeling, several other tales drag themselves into view.

A movie producer/director and his wife are determined to resurrect "King Solomon's Mines". To say that everything goes wrong is an understatement.

Handsome English boffin Donald Cragness (aged 31) is the technical consultant. We met him right at the start of our movie. He has a wide knowledge of everything. It is evident that he has fallen heavily for actress Tamara (who plays the female lead in the H. Ryder Haggard travesty).

While the film crew is located in Nevada, Cragness is sacked for doing his job. Then the crew move on to Mongolia and from there to Central Australia. By now, Jock and Elizabeth have been terminated, giving their movie a different look. Oh ... And a rogue rhinoceros.

The reputation of paeleornithologist Dominic Lynier is savagely tarnished by his arch-enemy Eric Conway. Conway brings in the heavy artillery: that is to say, he hires an expert to fake exhaustive proof that Dominic's theories are shonky.

Dominic fights back: literally!

And 2 experts on movie faking (those using AI trickery) agree that Conway's proof has been doctored and is worthless.

The scene in the Philatevia studio was written over a decade previously.

A man pulls up in a taxi, in the rain and he storms into the studio. He barges into an interview, throwing his weight around.

I can see that scene so clearly -- it is why people love to watch movies. That thrill of right and might overcoming crass skulduggery.
